Chapter 2 : Vintage Thunderbird Club International

"A Vintage Thunderbird" () Story by Ann Beattie not available online. Ann Beattie explores lifestyles of the young, urban, and sexually active in this chilly story of the summertime of life.

With a design direction firmly in place, Duke started the alteration of the body. It all seems pretty minor when you see the finished product because it all flows so well , but there is quite a lot happening here. The bumper was narrowed some 8 inches, smoothed, and turned upside down before it was reattached to its mounts. The rear bumper then received the exact same treatment. Of course it was a bit more complicated because exhaust tips had originally exited through the overriders and the panel behind them. With the overriders out of the picture it was determined that a new panel would be handformed, eliminating the holes, license plate indent, and have a bit more contour than the original, as well. When it was all in place the result was the same as up front; the car appears to be both wider and lower. The rear quarter-panels were such a mess they had to be completely reconstructed. Of course all the usual custom mods were done, too-the car was nosed, decked, and the door handles shaved. The chrome hash marks and V-8 emblems were removed from the front fenders, the chrome Thunderbird script from the rear quarters, and the turn signals relocated behind the grille insert. The interior came next and the instrument panel was one of the first areas to be attacked. The Astra-Dial instrument dome speedometer housing was filled with full digital instrumentation. The pods tachometer and clock at each side of the dome were removed and the area blended into a shape matching the rest of the dashboard. Then, to properly trim the area, a brushed-aluminum panel was created that wraps around the dashboard and into the door panels the same way the original engine-turned piece did. The difference is that the brushed surface has a smooth, flowing look to it while the original trim was quite busy. From there, Harry installed a cut-down by 6 inches pair of Fiero bucket seats, as well as all the wiring, before the car was turned over to Wayne Edwards. Wayne covered the seats, door panels, center hump, and kick panels in a beautiful cream-colored leather. Then he added a deep red carpet and cream vinyl headliner. The finished product is an interior that blends with the styling, rather than competing with the rest of the car. When asked what his favorite design features are, Harry told us the hood scoop and color-keyed window trim, and that the brushed-aluminum dash and door panel trim were his favorite interior highlights.
