As the number of publicly traded companies increased from the dozens to the hundreds, they soon realized that this process was time-consuming and held up the information queue, unable to keep up with frequently-changing prices especially after the advent of the stock-quoting ticker tape machine in see Understanding The Ticker Tape. To be more efficient in relaying price changes on company stock to investors, company names were shortened to one to five alpha symbols. In addition to saving time and capturing a specific stock price at the right time, stock symbols are useful when two or more companies have similar monikers. The former is a financial holding company, and the latter is a financial services and investment banking firm. An investor who wants to purchase shares in one would find it easier to know the stock symbol of the company he is interested in. There are also companies that are spinoffs of the same company and have similar stock symbols. Hewlett-Packard Enterprise, with stock symbol HPE, serves as the business service and hardware division and focuses on servers, storage, networking, and security. The stock symbol for HP Inc. An investor looking to purchase shares of HP Inc. Classy Symbols If the company has more than one class of shares trading in the market, then it will have the class added to its suffix. If it is a preferred stock, the letters "PR" and the letter denoting the class will typically be added. Different sources quote preferred shares in slightly different ways. Some stock symbols indicate whether the shares of a company have voting rights, especially if the company has more than one class of shares trading in the market. For example, Alphabet Inc. Class A shares are listed with stock symbol BRK. Companies trading on the NYSE typically have three or fewer letters representing their stock symbols. Nasdaq firms generally have four- or five-letter symbols, e. Additional Symbols and Trading Status Stock symbols are also used to convey information about the trading status of a company. On the Nasdaq, a fifth letter is added to stocks that are delinquent in certain exchange requirements: A company that is in bankruptcy proceedings will have a Q after its symbol, and a non-U. The meaning of the letters from A to Z are shown here: A " Class A shares, e. A B " Class B shares, e.
