Just take one look at the cover, and you just have to know that your day may have been lousy, but there is still beauty in the world, and all will be well! This journal has about pages (counting both sides of the pages).

Where dreams take flight: Rather than being viewed as pests, these birds are champions of endurance who evoke a passionate following across Pakistan. In film and folklore, pigeons, or "kabootar" are associated with love letters destined for harems and for military orders sent to champion warriors by kings of yesteryear. Pigeon followers broadly class the birds into those known for their competitive flying ability, and those prized for their looks. A Pakistani caretaker holds a pair of racing pigeons after a day of flying during the pigeon race national championship in Islamabad Akbar the Great was renowned for his pigeon passion, and, according to one scholar of the court "had 20, birds of different types," said Khan. It is a rare pastime that brings together people from different social backgrounds—experts are often illiterate and the owners are rich. A good pigeon can be valued at hundreds of dollars, equivalent to several months salary for many Pakistanis. Bird cages and enthusiasts can be found on rooftops in the old districts of cities across the country. Pakistani pigeons and experts have also been taken by Arab royals for tournaments in the Gulf. For so-called "high-flying" pigeons, the rules are simple: The winning team is the one which has the longest average flight time after a total of seven or eleven flights held every two days. Pigeon-fancying is a rare pastime that brings together people from different social backgrounds—experts are often illiterate and the owners are rich "We fly pigeon around 5 in morning after stamping them, and if the pigeon comes back around 4 to 5 in the evening we consider them good," explains Syed Mehtab Shah, a participant in the Bahrain Cup, one of a number of tournaments organised in spring and autumn. The conversation halts as two birds, which spent the day flying at 3, metres and are recognisable by the pink paint daubed under their wings, come in to land. Whisky and steroids The best champions, capable of flying for more than 12 hours without food or drink in exhausting heat, are showered with luxurious treatment often reserved for humans. The pigeon masters, known as "ustads", give their birds long massages with a damp towel and special concoctions to boost performance. In his book, Khan reveals his diet plans for the winged athletes: He speaks too of the benefits of port and whisky, illegal in Pakistan, precious saffron and ginseng. Bird cages and enthusiasts can be found on rooftops in the old districts of cities across the country There is no governing body regulating pigeon racing, so other less natural ingredients can creep in to the diet. The victors can take home mobile phones, motorcycles and even cars—proving a winning bird in hand can be worth more than several in the proverbial shrubbery. In this way, the story of love became a story of money. And it has become necessary to deal with the inevitable jealousy.
