Creation[edit] Before the creation of the new Korean alphabet, Koreans primarily wrote using Classical Chinese alongside native phonetic writing systems that predate the modern Korean alphabet by hundreds of years, including Idu script , Hyangchal , Gugyeol and Gakpil. A popular saying about the alphabet is, "A wise man can acquaint himself with them before the morning is over; even a stupid man can learn them in the space of ten days. The project was completed in late December or January , and described in in a document titled Hunminjeongeum The Proper Sounds for the Education of the People , after which the alphabet itself was originally named. Another document published in and titled Hunmin Jeongeum Haerye "Hunmin Jeongeum Explanation and Examples" was discovered in This document explains that the design of the consonant letters is based on articulatory phonetics and the design of the vowel letters are based on the principles of yin and yang and vowel harmony. Opposition[edit] The Korean alphabet faced opposition in the s by the literary elite, including politician Choe Manri and other Korean Confucian scholars. They believed Hanja was the only legitimate writing system. They also saw the circulation of the Korean alphabet as a threat to their status. In the 17th century, the Korean alphabet novels became a major genre. However, the Korean alphabet was still taught in Korean-established schools built after the annexation and Korean was written in a mixed Hanja-Hangul script, where most lexical roots were written in Hanja and grammatical forms in the Korean alphabet. Japan banned earlier Korean literature from public schooling, which became mandatory for children. Long vowels were marked by a diacritic dot to the left of the syllable, but this was dropped in The arae-a was abolished: The principal change was to make the Korean alphabet as morphophonemically practical given the existing letters. However, Japan banned the Korean language from schools in as part of a policy of cultural assimilation , [31] and all Korean-language publications were outlawed in In , North Korea attempted to make the script perfectly morphophonemic through the addition of new letters, and in , Syngman Rhee in South Korea attempted to simplify the orthography by returning to the colonial orthography of , but both reforms were abandoned after only a few years. Beginning in the s, Hanja began to experience a gradual decline in commercial or unofficial writing in the South due to government intervention, with some South Korean newspapers now only using Hanja as abbreviations or disambiguation of homonyms. There has been widespread debate as to the future of Hanja in South Korea. North Korea instated the Korean alphabet as its exclusive writing system in , and banned the use of Hanja completely. Contemporary use[edit] An elementary school sign in Baubau written in Indonesian and Korean While both North Korea and South Korea claim 99 percent literacy, a study found that 25 percent of those in the older generation in the South were not completely literate in the Korean alphabet.
