Chadha, you get a little weak kneed and nervous, even though you totally disagree. You know what I mean. Anyway, in our first meeting this year about the tutoring, he asked me about my classes. I went through them both, and while the Chemerinsky is definitely helpful, as always, I still appreciated having the actual cases available. Well, I totally loved this class. My random thoughts about the topic: The Judiciary Act of basically sucks. Why write something in words that you could write in 10? But, Chief Justice John Marshall is the man. This creates a real implementation problem for the military. When different circuits interpret laws differently, sometimes it works out okay for the executive branch. But, what if that person travels between bases in the First and Ninth Circuit? The easy answer would seem to be to stop firing people in both circuits, but that is not the road the military has chosen so far. Man, tribes, I really think you guys should sign onto the Constitution. This is what my final paper was about. I wonder if this will happen, and, if so, whether it will look like what we have now and just have more authority, or if it will require an entire restructuring of the UN. The book itself is. Learning law is funny because the topics with interesting fact patterns tend to have boring legal questions, while the topics with boring fact patterns have fascinating legal questions. This topic is definitely the latter. Total favorite for me.
