Spread a tablespoon of pizza sauce on each muffin half. Create a monster face using the toppings above. Place on a cookie sheet and bake in a preheated oven for 15 minutes, or until the cheese melts. Then finish filling the glove with popped popcorn. Tie off the end of the glove with a piece of twine. Monster Face Have each student spread peanut butter on a toasted English muffin or rice cake. Use raisins for the eyes, cut a nose and ears from a cheese slice, and use peanut halves for teeth. Hair can be miniature pretzel sticks broken in half with a miniature marshmallow stuck on the end of each stick. You can easily cut two ears from the cheese by using a small glass or another circular item, then simply snip the circle in half with kitchen shears. This forms the two ears. To make the nose just snip off the corner of the cheese slice. Or you can use pepperoni slices for the ears and just snip off one side of the slice. Or if you wanted to use a big, round cookie, you could have them spread it with colored frosting. Use a cherry half for a nose and candy corn for the teeth. Vanilla wafers cut in half will make the ears. Hair can be added using colored shredded coconut. Here are some ideas to help you get started. Some are just plain cute! Put crayon shavings between two pieces of wax paper and melt crayon shavings with a warm iron. When cool, cut the paper in the shape of a monster. That shape could resemble more of a "blob", or a "ghost shape" or have a jagged shape. Then have students glue on shredded paper for hair. Provide them with other items for facial features and other details. These could be made from construction paper, wiggly eyes, pipecleaners, buttons, furry material, felt, aluminum foil, permanent markers, hole reinforcers, raffia, moss, yarn, pasta, rick-rack, etc. Another type monster could be made from construction paper shapes. Either provide students with appropriate sized shapes to cut out, or provide them with the construction paper and have them design their own shapes. They could be given a circle, square, or oval pattern for the head, four rectangles for arms and legs, and a larger rectangle or square for a body. If made extra long, the arms and legs could be accordion-folded to provide springy arms and legs. You could also provide students with monster parts on construction paper. Have them cut out the parts and make their monster. If you provide multiple parts for the parts of the body 3 different noses, 6 eyes, etc. This will make each monster unique, depending on the student. Another idea is to provide each student with a paperplate to use as a monster face. Staple the two shapes together and have students create their monsters using paint and various other materials. Stuff with shredded newspaper. These can be hung in the hall or from the ceiling. Display this poem with them and have incoming moms or other relatives try to guess which one is their child.

Introduction[edit] The introduction starts the book in the setting of a small picnic of a human and his dog. The human is apparently telling the reader to not venture into the Withering Wood, a forest of trees rumored to have legendary creatures such as "hairy trolls , nasty gnomes , and scary pixies and fairies. Dennis screams and shouts he will not go to bed. The mother, surprised at this sudden fear of bed, asks why. Dennis explains that he is afraid of humans. She begins to kiss Dennis, but Dennis reacts and bites her on the nose. She then readies him for bed. However, Dennis concludes he will sleep under his bed so the humans will not be able to find him. Not knowing where he is, he walks into the cave for rest. He then decides to sleep. He changes into his night clothes and begins to fall asleep. With the absence of his mother, he checks under the bed himself, and to his surprise, he finds Dennis. Both Dennis and the young boy run away. As the main character of the story, he has many human -like features, such as smiling, [9] walking, [9] and emotion. Dennis also possesses several toys. He believes that there are humans underneath his bed, just as humans believe there are monsters underneath their beds. He has even bitten her nose while she was about to kiss him. She keeps the light on, she gives Dennis his teddy bear. Both Dennis and the boy had the same reaction; they were afraid of each other. It is unknown what happened to the boy after the small incident. Picnic boy, a small boy introduced at the beginning of the story, and tells the reader of the dangers of the "Withering Wood". There are two major morals in The Monster Bed that can both give children two lessons. It also teaches children to check under the bed themselves. Some were excited their child had begun reading, [18] and some loved the illustrations, plot, and characters. The book was written by Jeanne Willis. The illustrations give the reader the impression that both Dennis and his mother are just like humans.
