As much fun as my extreme writing challenges are, sometimes a girl just wants to write with no constraints. I always give those people the spiel about how they teach me about the flexibility of the English language and help me to convey single ideas in an endless number of ways. I want to share a story I would write without any limitations. Next post will be business as usual. Especially on the days she wears those wool sweaters. Nothing beats the moment she grabs a book and sits on the seat built into the window. It was a drug I never gave up. Even when I grew and I could only lie on her stomach with my paws on her chest, reaching for her face. Extra heat, yes please! When my favorite napping place began to morph into a mound not fit for comfortable sleep, I grew a little worried. Was it a punishment? Did I eat one too many leaves off of the fern in the front window? Had I left paw print evidence of my midnight adventures on the kitchen counter? When I tried, I either rolled right off or the lump in her shirt would kick me. I resorted to sleeping in the fresh laundry, no matter how much she scolded me. I barely noticed when her belly returned to normal. The return of my napping refuge came at the price of a new creature invading my territory. The creature was almost permanently affixed to the warm belly I once napped upon. I was left to perch myself on the back of the sofa and look down upon the squealing thief in my spot. It stole my mousie toys and for a brief period even helped itself to my food. Only after it was locked in its bedroom was I free to curl up in my usual spot on her stomach, and only if I could catch her on the sofa before she found something to scrub or sweep or dust. I accepted this new lifestyle eventuallyâ€”against my will, of course. The creature began to grow, and the larger it became, the more belly time I seemed to procure. On a winter night, she was cooking in the kitchen and the creature sat calmly in front of the television. Approaching with caution, I surveyed the creature as I cursed the cold air that had seeped in from the outside. It was a risk, but it was one worth taking. There is no better napping place than Her stomach. But in a pinch, the creature is just as happy to have me on his.
