On the standard paper such as this one below, some banding is apparent from the printing process and the colors are flatter with less graduation. This is a minor quibble for a kids polaroid camera though. Also, the back peels off to become a sticker! See the process to update the Polaroid Snap firmware here. Loading Paper Paper is loaded via a door on the rear of the camera, and for younger kids this would best be done by an adult. The paper comes in packs of 10 and is loose, so with little hands it could go everywhere. Once removed from the packaging it needs to be inserted with the barcode facing down into the camera. The barcode sheet ejects when the shutter release is pushed the first time – ie, no photo for the first one. Operation The operation of the camera is very simple with only a few buttons. Turning it off is simply pushing the viewfinder back down. There are no other controls and the flash is automatic. After taking a photo, the print comes out automatically and takes seconds. The lens cap is held on magnetically, so you just pull it off. But – no string. Camera Size One clear advantage of the Polaroid Snap is that the size and shape is much smaller and more convenient than the Instax range. You can see the difference here sitting next to my Instax Mini It seems Polaroid took this onboard and released the Polaroid Snap Touch with an LCD screen on the rear of the camera instead of a viewfinder. This makes framing shots a breeze, but it is the most expensive of all of the instant cameras. Bottom Line The Instax cameras win on image quality, but for simplicity, print costs and the convenience of a smaller camera, the Snap is the best value kids polaroid camera. Buying A couple of tips for buying – order paper see options here and buy a 16GB or 32GB microSD card with it so you can update the firmware. Setup Setup is very simple, only requiring the installation of 2 x AA batteries and a film cartridge. Loading Film Film comes in a small cartridge of 10 with a cover sheet which makes loading very easy. Operation The Mini 9 has a chunky grip on the right with the shutter release in easy reach of the index finger. It naturally takes photos in portrait and the photo ejects out of the top. The flash fires every time which helps reduce blur but can wash out the colors if the subject is too close. The exposure is set manually for different conditions inside, cloudy, sunny by twisting the dial around the lens, but thankfully it shows you which setting to use. The light is measured and the appropriate setting is lit – just twist the dial to match. No guesswork at all. The Instax Mini 9 has 2 small but useful changes over the older Instax Mini 8: Selfie mirror on the front of the camera next to the lens. Inclusion of a closeup lens attachment for shooting up to 35cm away. Both are shown in this image. The overall size with the camera off lens in is 4. The photos are smaller than the Polaroid Snap and it is fairly large and chunky. The traditional film produces good results and the camera is simple to use. Buying The camera itself is cheap, but remember to buy at least a 20 pack of film – the first 10 will go quickly! Setup The camera comes with its own battery pack, wall mounted charger and neck strap in the box. Before using the camera the battery must be charged and then inserted into the battery compartment in the rear door. Loading Film The film cartridge 10 shots is loaded via the large rear door of the camera and like the Mini 9, the cover sheet is ejected automatically when the camera is first turned on. Operation Turning the Mini 90 on and off is done by twisting the power switch which is located around the front shutter release button. The Mini 90 is great for both portrait and landscape photos as it has 2 shutter release buttons. The one on the front for portrait mode and another on the edge for landscape which you can see here: Pressing any of the buttons continuously will cycle through each of its settings. Here I have the red-eye flash setting enabled and there are 2 shots left. Camera Size The size is 4.
