For two weeks, I spent the days with strangers from all over the world. At night, I slept in a small cabin below deck with three Italian matrons who disapproved of my summer attire. A young Italian man who worked on the ship saw me standing alone with my two suitcases and asked if I needed help. He bought me a train ticket to Cologne and had my suitcases shipped there. My train would not depart until the following morning, so for 24 hours, we roamed the city. He introduced me to calamari and espresso, and it was almost dusk when we went to sleep like siblings on a bench by the harbor. That was the beginning of a year of adventure: Taking a year off from formal education enjoys a venerable tradition in Europe and in Australia, where young people are encouraged to take a break to travel, intern, work, or volunteer in a community service project. Typically setting out in horse-drawn carriages and later, on trains, they carried letters of introduction that would open doors for them in foreign places. This was the Wanderjahr. With its double meaning of hiking and wandering, Wanderjahr suggests both a sense of purpose and the possibility of serendipity. The German term originated with guilds in the late Middle Ages. Upon completing their training, apprentices were expected to set out on foot to other villages, again with a letter of recommendation in their possession, to practice their trade with new masters who would teach them novel ways of doing familiar work. The education of a tradesman was not complete without this period of roaming. After WWII, the gap year became more widely popular, spawning the low-budget branch of tourism exemplified by the Lonely Planet guides. This kind of adventuring remained the domain of men until the 1970s, when women claimed their place in higher ed as well as in gap-year travel. Americans do not have a tradition of taking unstructured time off from school. Though this is a culture of pioneers who left their homes in search of a better life, it is not one that encourages rambling. Suspicious of leisure, they put a premium on quantifiable achievement, defining success as climbing the ladder one rung at a time. The options are either up or down, and taking a detour could mean falling off. Parents in the United States expect their college-bound kids to follow a straight and narrow path: The results of this period of unstructured learning are not easily measured. Farmers know the benefits of crop rotation, of letting a field lie fallow to ensure more robust harvests in the future. Similarly, taking time off seems to spawn greater productivity and creativity among students who return to school. According to a U. Harvard University, which has nearly a 98 percent graduation rate, pioneered the gap year trend among Ivy League schools by recommending to incoming freshmen that they consider taking time off before starting their studies. How do those people live? The high school years are often extremely stressful for teens. In order to gain admission to a respected college, kids are under a lot of pressure to look exceptional on paper. The documentary film Race to Nowhere, shown at thousands of schools in the U. When they step off the academic treadmill to work or travel, young people have the opportunity to look beyond themselves. There are millions of other people out there who will never sit in a classroom with them. What do they believe and yearn for? How do you relate to those who are different? National newspapers feature experts who insist that it can make students more mature and confident because it helps them to clarify objectives. In 2013, Rebecca R. American parents do seem to have concerns that their kids will drift into some version of a video-gaming and pot-smoking nightmare if they take a gap year. But in fact, partying seems to be a function of leaving home and being unsupervised. Parents, he said, also worry that after the freedom of a gap year, their kids will not want to go back to studying, writing essays, and taking tests. But anecdotal evidence from college admissions officers across the country indicates that few drop off the college radar. Denise Pope, a senior lecturer at the Stanford School of Education, is founder of the Palo Alto-based Challenge Success, an organization dedicated to reducing the academic pressure on high-achieving students and parents. She agrees that there is no evidence to support this fear. Starting college straight out of high school, students have to cope with several big changes at once: This may go some way in explaining why a gap-year industry has emerged in the United States in the last decade.

Nonprofits as well as profit-driven companies offer formal programs ranging from gritty volunteer work to cushy semi-academic travel ventures. Live with a Peruvian family while teaching English in Lima, or with a Guatemalan family while learning Spanish. Harvest blueberries in Maine. Assist teachers in a Senegalese village. Hike, climb, or count sea turtles. Some programs cost thousands of dollars; others offer room and board in exchange for work. Their websites typically feature young people with giant backpacks, jumping in the air with big smiles on their faces. The message is clear: A hyper-structured gap year might not offer the challenges and opportunities that are associated with the traditional Wanderjahr. In our technology-saturated world, we are never really disconnected from home. All the more reason that taking a year off should involve personal exploration and discovery. You might find yourself playing your guitar in a village plaza to make some money, or working a quasi-legal waitressing job. What if you get fired or lose your passport, or get pickpocketed? Or, as I did, the kindness of a stranger. Berkeley High grad Chandrika worked for six months and then traveled in Ghana for six months to get to know her ancestral culture. She says that the experience was pivotal in her development. From Seattle, where she is doing a graduate program, she talked to me about the challenges she experienced. But it quickly turned into one of the best things I could have done for myself. It was a really hot night, so we all went into the hallway with candles and lay on the cool cement floor, just laughing and having a good time. To be safe, she journeyed with a friend. The two flew to New Zealand, and from there made their way country to country with a loose itinerary. Instead of letters of introduction, they had phone numbers of friends of friends. Sometimes they stayed with those folks; other times they worked on an organic farm or in a retreat center. Caitlin also got robbed, but considers it to be one of many lessons learned. Furthermore, most of the scholarship programs that support low-income or first-generation students would be unavailable if the student took a year off and returned to school. An admitted student could write a letter to the director of undergraduate admissions, asking for a deferral with a tangible plan for the gap year and an explanation of how this would add to their qualifications. The current director of admissions, Amy W. Jarich, could not be reached for comment. According to University spokesperson Janet Gilmore, Berkeley does not have an official policy regarding gap-year admissions deferrals. Pera Gorsen, who did research on first-generation college students as a sociology major at Mills College, points out that these students, who usually work part-time, tend to be overwhelmed by school requirements and often take time out to earn more money or clarify their goals. In an initiative intended to make a gap year accessible for students from low- and middle-income backgrounds, Tufts University has announced a new program offering to fund housing, travel, and other fees. Norbert College in Wisconsin. It makes sense to integrate a year of discovery and service into the American educational system and to support it with scholarships and loans. With such financial assistance, a Wanderjahr could be possible for everyone. Young Americans would learn the nonacademic skills required by the contemporary job market. She incorporated travel adventures into her studies, so her Ph.

For I am convinced that neither death nor life, neither angels nor demons, neither the present nor the future, nor any powers, neither height nor depth, nor anything else in all creation, will be able to separate us from the love of God that is in Christ Jesus our Lord. Seuss wrote a book which is often given out to high school graduates. It begins with the exciting thought that this is your day, and you are off to great places. You have feet in your shoes. You can steer yourself in any direction you choose. Perhaps college, a new job, a new home, a backpacking trip around Europe, a mission trip, work within the community, etc. There are many great experiences God allows us to have. But there are also tough ones. Seuss is right that we will encounter things that will scare us, we know that we are never alone because we have the love of God with us. The Lord told Joshua to be strong and courageous because the Lord would be with him wherever he went. The Lord tells him not to be discouraged, and to always keep the word on his lips. Joshua was never to turn away from Him. With obedience in God, Joshua showed his faith in the Lord. It was a difficult time for the Israelites as they entered new territory and conquered the land. But through all of this, God never left them. In all of the places we will go, God will never leave us either. Whether it is a new job, a new school, an adventure across the United States, God is with us, and nothing can separate us from Him. The Spirit has brought us to God, who adopted us as His children. Our Father never abandons us. In Mathew 10, we see the disciples going out to proclaim the good news. God promises to be with them, for there will be people who will be against them. As Christians, there will be people against our faith, and there will be sin trying to bring us down and make us feel alone. His word gives us strength while His Spirit helps us when we are weak. He knows our hearts and hears our prayers. God uses us for His purpose, and nothing can separate us from Him. Prayer Dear Lord, thank You for the places we go in our lives. Though some are not as easy as others, we are comforted knowing You are with us, and You never abandon us.
