Traveling to Disney appealed to me about as much as child birth: Both experiences seemed unpleasant, but necessary. The great pilgrimage to Mouse Country has become a parental rite of passage. Perhaps Disneyland was the most photographed place on Instagram in because much like getting your passport stamped, you sometimes need proof you made the trek. If it feels like everyone you know is going to or has just returned from Disney, your intuition is correct, more than 35 million people traveled to Disneyland and Disney World in , according to unofficial estimates, which is roughly 10 percent of the population of the United States. For the cost of days at Disney I could go to Italy for a week. Was there any chance Disney could be as great as Italy? Then there was the debate over whether Disney World or Disneyland was better. Two weeks before our departure, it became clear my husband, who enjoys work like most of us enjoy vacation, was firm in his resolve that he was needed at home. I felt relieved that we were going to the older, smaller park, the more manageable option where we could walk straight out of the hotel and into either park. You enter the Grand Californian Hotel through two gigantic stained-glass doors depicting the California wilderness, which open to an enormous, dark, wooden lobby with ceilings that reach the sky. The dark interior feels like a chalet or hunting lodge with a front desk made of carved wood. Everywhere I looked, there were smiling employees offering to help. Built in and remodeled in , the Grand Californian derives its inspiration from the California Arts and Crafts movement with an architectural style that seamlessly blends massive open spaces with details like high-backed chairs and low lighting, creating intimate alcoves within the vastness. On each floor, by the elevators are bird statues, which are accurately positioned based on how high the featured bird can fly. The first floor has a penguin while the top floor has an eagle. Mouse details are carved into the wood and hidden in the William Morris-style carpets, making for endless games of I Spy. Details and planning are important to most Disney goers, too. Mercier has been to the Magic Kingdom more than 15 times and Disneyland once. Her best advice is: I set reminders in my calendar and I even set alarms to get up early in the morning six months in advance to book meals. Standing in the lobby, watching the other families I became a little worried that The Mouse was going annihilate my laissez-faire travel style. My attempt at a viral Instagram shot of us holding hands and jumping in unison with Disney ablaze behind us failed miserably, both kids were experiencing the crash that comes when anticipation meets reality. It had been a long travel day and we were all tired. Ten out of 10, 20 out of 21, the numbers were staggering. I wondered how much his Disney bling had cost. We happened by the Bibbidi Bobbidi Boutique, a place that turns little girls into princesses "hair, makeup, and costume sold to your little royal. My 4-year-old daughter was entranced. Her costumes expose this bias, a tattered make-shift Wonder Woman dress is always favored over the pristine poufy gowns still donning price tags in the dress-up pile. As fellow preschool-age girls arrived in full ball regalia, she grew angrier and angrier. I looked at the parents with their perfect princess daughters and I started to get mad, too. This was a disaster. When we finally got inside the chapel-like space, she locked eyes on Snow White. Yet, the older people, presumably grandparents, seemed to be laughing and having a great time with the children they were accompanying. After dinner, we admired the pins on a cart outside the restaurant. I let each kid pick a mystery pack of three and lanyard. Day two we went to California Adventure. On the way over, we stopped to buy some water. The woman in front of us was buying her grandson cotton candy. It was 9 a. Parents were yelling at children to sit down, to eat and to behave. Grandparents were laughing and pointing as cars whizzed past on the Radiator Springs Racers outside. If little Jimmy wanted cotton candy for breakfast, he could have it. We, the parents, had it all wrong. At Disney, everyone is a kid. I am living through a stage of life where my kids want to be with me. They want to hold my hand and split an ice cream. This is a time that I know I will miss terribly. It was about the fluidity of time and the sacredness of childhood. They set a better schedule than I could have ever planned. When it was hot in the afternoon we went for a swim. They opted to take naps and hit the park late at night. I never made it on a bunch of rides, but my son and I rode Space Mountain together, just as my Dad and I had 35 years earlier. My daughter decided not to go back to princess charm school, opting instead for a pair of Black Widow gloves. After our third time on the Star Tours ride, we made our own lightsabers and found a pair of Stormtrooper socks to bring home to Dad. I gained 5 pounds in five days and have never been happier about it. Emily Kumler Kaplan can be reached at newsyoucanuse gmail.
