Have children stand with arms all the way out and cut a piece of string to reach all the way from one hand to the other. Staple ends of string to each handprint. Cut out a heart shape and staple into the middle. Directions I recently went to a class for parents and providers and the speaker gave everyone a little baggie with a slip of paper in it. On it was written: A ROSE " to remind you to take time to smell the flowers. A BAG " to help you keep it all together. Have the children go through magazines and find pictures of all the things their mothers do. Cut them out and glue them onto construction paper. The same can be done for dad. Another variation is to have the children cut out pictures to represent the people in their family and the things they like to do as a family. How many people are in your family? Who is in yours? What daddies and mommies do? Favorite activities with mom, dad, siblings? Name three mothers in your family. Name three mothers outside your family. Name three people who might be mothers one day. How are human moms like animal moms, and how are they different? What do you think moms like about being moms? Ask the child to tell you one thing they love about their mom and then write it on a big heart which you paste into the center of a fingerpainting the child has done and then display them for everyone to read.

All you need for this little project is some construction paper, colored tissue paper, die cut letters, liquid glue, paper plates, and some cheap pencils I recommend using the ones that I know you have in storage. We all have them. They are probably from the dollar store and if you ever sharpen one it will look like a beaver tried to gnaw on it. Now you can put them to some useful purpose. Here is what you do to make this little goody. Die cut the letters MOM. You can use a variety of colors. I usually cut out several colors for the kids to choose from. Glue the letters down the side of a 12x18 sheet of construction paper. Cut tissue paper into long strips and then chop into 2x2 inch squares. You can just eyeball it. Give each kiddo a cheapo pencil, tissue paper squares, and a puddle of liquid glue on a paper plate. Dab the tissue paper covered eraser in the glue and use the pencil to stick the tissue paper on the letter O to build their 3-D flower. They just repeat the process until it is all full and fluffy. I have also had some kids just ball up the squares and dip them in glue. This worked well for some of my inclusion population babies who lacked the fine motor skills for the pencil twist method. Some kids are in tough situations. Maybe mom is deceased, incarcerated, or absent. We need to be mindful of them and not put them in awkward situations unnecessarily. That is why I always offer this option to ALL of my students, too. Many times kids who have awesome moms choose this one, too, so no one is singled out or made to feel inferior. Again, you can do any color or a rainbow heart looks great, too. For the writing project, I tell my kiddos that they are welcome to write about their mothers or they can choose to honor any woman who cares for them. Once, I even had a child write about the nurse who cared for him during his cancer treatments. It was so moving! They can write to an aunt, grandma, stepmother, foster mom, you name it! As an RtI and inclusion teacher, I am always looking for easy ways to differentiate things --even crafts! So, I have included three different types of lined paper for the writing portion of the project. You can use just one or differentiate with all of them. It is illustrated by the fabulous Jan Brett. It tells the story of three little mice who go out in search for the perfect gifts for their mom. On his journey, he makes up a song for her instead. It is such a sweet tale! I have a little mini-unit to go along with it in my TPT shop.
