What should I do if there is an abduction? Indicators may include packed suitcases and luggage found at the residence, discovery of recently purchased international airline tickets or a recently issued passport for the child and abductor. If you believe removal is imminent contact: Federal law prohibits law enforcement agencies from establishing or maintaining a waiting period before accepting a missing child report 42 U. Federal law requires law enforcement agencies to respond in a specific way, regardless of the reason why a child is missing. Do I need a custody order? It is not necessary for parents and guardians to have a custody determination to report their child missing to law enforcement, but you may wish to obtain one, because a custody order can help clarify and define your rights and responsibilities to your child and obtain the assistance of law enforcement for the pickup and return of your child. Not all states have well-articulated laws regarding custodial rights that arise by operation of law, in the absence of a court order or legal agreement. It is best to confer with an attorney. How do I prevent a family abduction? Parents sometimes have concerns based on specific threats or suspicions of abduction, but are unaware of the steps they can take to actively safeguard their children. Knowing when to ask for preventative measures and which ones to request depends on the risk of abduction, obstacles to recovery and potential harm to the child if abducted. Custody orders A good first step to preventing an abduction is obtaining a custody order specifying the rights of both parents with respect to the child. If there are concerns of abduction the court may be able include preventative measures such as supervised visitations or child custody bonds. If an order already exists but does not include abduction prevention provisions, a parent may want to go back to court and modify the order to include these measures. International abductions The U. Parents and guardians with concerns about an international abduction may want to consider including specific abduction prevention provisions in their custody order prohibiting the travel of children outside the U. Parents concerned about international abduction should also contact the U. This program allows parents to confirm if a passport has already been issued for their child and receive a notification if a passport is requested in the future. Coping with the experience of a family abduction demands courage and determination on the part of the victim, parents and guardians and other family members. NCMEC can also locate short and long term support for families through local victim advocates and mental health agencies. Reunification The goal of every missing child case is to safely locate and recover the child. These children may not remember the other parent, they may have developed a close bond and relationship with the abductor, they may have assimilated to their new environment, they may have been told a different story about their circumstances and they may even speak a different language. All of these factors can greatly impact how the child reacts to being recovered. Law enforcement and parents should work with a multidisciplinary team of professionals, including mental health and social service professionals, to help address any concerns or issues that may come up, and to ensure the reunification process is not an additionally traumatic experience for the child. This team of volunteers provides assistance to families of missing or sexually exploited children by offering peer support, resources and empowerment from trained volunteers. These volunteers are mothers, fathers, siblings and extended family members who have experience with a missing or exploited child case. Travel assistance also may be available for parents or guardians who need travel assistance within the United States to be reunited with a recovered child. Report Child Sexual Exploitation.

Feb 11, Matt was on his way to the bathroom five minutes before school was over. His father, who Matt has never met, was near the bathroom dressed as a worker for UPS. After a while, the two got home safely, and so did Pookie. One of the reasons I liked this book was because of its ending.
