It was a pharmacy and a newsstand—a shoeshine and a dry goods store—you could cash checks there, receive mail there, or get a quick meal at the lunch counter and soda fountain. They served hamburgers, eggs and onions, lox, meatloaf, corned beef and cabbage, chop suey, beef stew, lentil soup, and all kinds of pie—you could get malts, egg creams milk, seltzer, and syrup, and phosphate sodas. The movers, shakers and Hollywood deal makers all hung out there. An out of work actor could always depend on getting a meal on credit or for free as Lucille Ball did many times there during her chorus girl days. My mother told us if anyone needed, give, never turn down. The star of the film was Rock Hudson. They renovated an existing, but run-down pharmacy at Sunset Boulevard and Crescent Heights Boulevard. The drug store was situated near the RKO, Columbia, and Republic Studios and across the street from the famous upscale residential complex, Garden of Allah. The brothers began catering to their studio clientele, installing a row of telephone booths and instituting a paging service—so agents could quickly contact actors. It was a dark, crowded and cozy space at the time. Bit-players were close to the lots when news circulated about upcoming casting calls. Copies of Variety magazine circulated from hand to hand. Eventually the Schwab brothers would open 7 locations, but none would surpass the popularity of the original. Marilyn Monroe had her prescriptions filled there, Gloria Swanson got her make-up there, and Cher bought lipstick by the case. Ava Gardner and Charlie Chaplan occasionally jumped behind the counter, to the amusement of fellow actors and the delight of movie fans. Kind of a combination coffee klatch, and waiting room. Waiting, waiting for the Gravy train. The eye drops in the center from when she was married to Arthur Miller.
