Since the purchase there have been 5 incidents where the van has lost all electrical power making clicking noises, and leaving us stranded. The final incident happened on Dec. The vehicle completely shut down and was making the clicking noises. The power steering was lost, headlights off and all other electrical functions were unavailable. Once in complete darkness we noticed we had shifted into the oncoming lane of traffic. We noticed headlights coming at us in the distance, luckily quick thinking and use of a flashlight we were able to warn the oncoming vehicle of our position in their lane. They stopped in front of our vehicle and turned on their hazards to provide warning for other vehicles. Being that we were in imminent danger, I had to disconnect the battery and let the system reset. After taking it to the dealership they once again said they could not find a problem. The dealership only stated, " have it towed in when it happens". Being that the last 2 times this happened we were left stranded in traffic, during late hours with absolutely no electrical power and my children in the car, it was impossible to wait to be towed in. They were unsafe situations that potentially had fatal results. I had to make the best decision at the time to protect my family. I am beyond frustrated with Chrysler for allowing me to leave the shop every time with no solution to the problem. My kids are afraid to get in van for fear of breaking down yet again. Five incidents with no resolution, no one knows how to fix the problem! Has gotten progressively worse to now, killing the engine suddenly while under power conditions, leaving vehicle without power steering and necessitating shifting to neutral while at full road speed, and restarting the engine to regain operative control, all while in operation on the road in traffic. This has happened on four occasions during the past three weeks to this date. Vehicle also has electrical "hiccups" resulting in disengagement of transmission under operating conditions, which has so far six incidences re-engaged within ten seconds pursuant. This morning, July 11, , while awaiting a traffic light, the engine killed and the entire system locked up for several minutes, including inability to move shifter, no response to key in ignition; complete shutdown. Approximately four to five minutes later, it suddenly unlocked, was able to be put in neutral and restarted, and driven away with no indication of any difficulty, as if nothing had happened. All of the above events have been simialaly intermittent and unpredictable. It is apparent to me that something is defective in this vehicle, and I have encountered several other owners of Chrysler trucks and minivans who have experienced some or all of the above.

Chapter 2 : "Noisy town" at Usborne Books at Home

The sound buttons are large and easy for little hands to push and the sound quality is excellent. The only drawback is occasionally thinking that the siren we are hearing, as we drive, is on the road with us rather than in the book.

Posted on October 11, by thefriendlymoth I want to share something really cool that formed in class today. Everyone, including me, was given a small slip of paper. We each wrote one line. Then I put them in the best order that occurred to me. The poem it formed was really exciting, and the class thought so too. There was a kind of wildness and unity, and of course a real noisy, visceral liveliness in it. But enough talking about poetry like an abstract wine taster – you can read it yourself. The Busy City I can hear the peaceful sound of the city. I hear a sound that sounds like somebody going flop. Up the escalator, down the very tall stairs. Honk goes the cars. Gun – RAT-A tat tat. Honk, crash, boom, eeeeeeeeeooo. The town was noisy. Too loud, too loud. The town is too loud. The wind of the storm. The guns in a riot. Insects in the night. Honk, whew, bang, croak, criou. There were rock bands playing and pots slamming together. Creak, squeak, creak, squeak, wipers sweep the splashy glass the splishy fishy puddle washing wheels crossing hills heading home through the rain beat streets. The moths are buzzing with their golden wings under the light of the moon. My heart beat goes on and on.
