Not easy to answer, right? Indeed there are not many well-known quotes about this powerful instrument we all have. I decided to collect the ones I knew, search for some new ones, and put them all together. Now I share this selection with you. But she knew very well that uttering these words with the right emotions is the ultimate way to touch people. Can you imagine her reciting her own poems? You can watch her here and feel what this quote is all about. He has delighted us with fascinating music written for a wide range of instruments. We choose the right words. We say these words. The tone of our voice matters. Will you be empathetic with the person who will hear your words? One of the best quotes of German philosopher Nietzsche reminds us this. This old proverb is a true homage to all those moments when our voices painted the world with colors and sounds. It has been used to depict yoga, meditation, and other activities in which breathing is a key element. With a proper breathe we can make any audience to follow us along every word we say. Although he began his career coaching singers, Love was soon commissioned by actors and public speakers to share his secrets for a powerful voice. With this quote, Love reminds us that a high-performance athlete would never run a race without first warming up. Similarly, a professional speaker cannot perform at their vocal peak without doing vocal warm-ups first. I wish these quotes give you inspiration to breathe, warm up, add emotions and make your voice your perfect instrument in life.

Background[edit] By the summer of , Mahler had been director of the Vienna Hofoper for nine years. The first note is as follows: Caritas "Christian love" Hymn: Die Geburt des Eros "The birth of Eros" [10] The second note includes musical sketches for the Veni creator movement, and two bars in B minor which are thought to relate to the Caritas. The four-movement plan is retained in a slightly different form, still without specific indication of the extent of the choral element: Hymne "Creation through Eros. He told Specht that having chanced on the Veni creator hymn, he had a sudden vision of the complete work: When it did, according to Alma Mahler, "the complete text fitted the music exactly. Intuitively he had composed the music for the full strophes [verses]. There are no longer human voices, but planets and suns revolving. Mahler made arrangements with the impresario Emil Gutmann for the symphony to be premiered in Munich in the autumn of He soon regretted this involvement, writing of his fears that Gutmann would turn the performance into "a catastrophic Barnum and Bailey show". Through the spring and summer these forces prepared in their home towns, before assembling in Munich early in September for three full days of final rehearsals under Mahler. You have not only a right but a duty to do so. Eight months after his Munich triumph, he died at the age of The occasion was a great success; the symphony was played several more times in Philadelphia before the orchestra and choruses travelled to New York, for a series of equally well-received performances at the Metropolitan Opera House. The work was played again eight years later by the same forces; among those present in the audience was the youthful composer Benjamin Britten. Impressed by the music, he nevertheless found the performance itself "execrable". Despite the evident disparities within this juxtaposition, the work as a whole expresses a single idea, that of redemption through the power of love. Here, what Kennedy calls "the unmistakable presence of twentieth-century Mahler" is felt as a solo soprano introduces a meditative theme. The section is interrupted by a short orchestral interlude in which the low bells are sounded, adding a sombre touch to the music. This is a passage of great complexity, in the form of a double fugue involving development of many of the preceding themes, with constant changes to the key signature. Thereafter the music moves swiftly and powerfully to its climax, in which an offstage brass ensemble bursts forth with the "Accende" theme while the main orchestra and choruses end on a triumphant rising scale. The exposition begins in near-silence; the scene depicted is that of a rocky, wooded mountainside, the dwelling place of anchorites whose utterances are heard in an atmospheric chorus complete with whispers and echoes. The blessed boys receive the soul gladly; their voices are joined by Doctor Marianus tenor , who accompanies their chorus before breaking into a rapturous E major paean to the Mater Gloriosa, "Queen and ruler of the world! In these arias the "love" theme is further explored, and the "scherzo" theme associated with the first appearance of the angels returns. A short orchestral passage follows, scored for an eccentric chamber group consisting of piccolo, flute, clarinet, harmonium, celesta, piano, harps and a string quartet. As the climax approaches, many themes are reprised: Finally, as the chorus concludes with "The eternal feminine draws us on high", the off-stage brass re-enters with a final salute on the Veni creator motif, to end the symphony with a triumphant flourish.
