

Chapter 1 : PICK UP THE PIECES TAB by Average White Band @ theinnatdunvilla.com

Picking Up The Peaces is a not for profit organisation committed to raising awareness about the detrimental effects of stigma and the signs and symptoms of PTSD and how, by seeking intervention early, sufferers and their families can regain some functionality and an improved quality of life.

Men and women automatically feel humiliated when their partner cheats, even though they themselves have done nothing to be ashamed of. Too often, those addicts and abusers shift the blame onto their wives and husbands. Betrayal is a devastating assault upon our ability to trust – to trust in ourselves, other people, our sense of justice, even God. It can affect our self-esteem, if we let it. For some people, the worst part of adultery is the dishonesty – sharing our life with someone whom we discover has been living a lie day in and day out. We start to doubt our own senses, let alone our own attractiveness. Who was he or she, really? We go over in our mind past intimate moments and wonder what he or she was thinking. We recall clues and doubt that we dismissed, and wonder what we were thinking. When the truth finally comes out, along with the pain is a sense of relief, because it validates what we intuitively suspected. But then we wonder if he or she loved me all those years – was it all fake? Was I in love with a fraud? We can begin to distrust our judgment in the future. Can I trust another man or woman? When our partner was unfaithful with someone we know, care for and trust, we suffer betrayal by two people. The pain of the double betrayal is horrendous. Rebuilding trust can be a long process. Building bridges of empathy with each other can only begin when the betrayer takes responsibility. Sometimes, adultery is a symptom of problems in the marriage – a lack of open communication, sex, or emotional intimacy. It can be viewed as an act of defiance. It means that the relationship itself and both partners need help in changing their communication patterns and developing a healthier intimate connection. Addiction is rampant in America – our codependent country – and sex addiction is rarely talked about. Only our actions reflect on us.
