Additional Information In lieu of an abstract, here is a brief excerpt of the content: Out of the early Christian rejection of corporal experience comes a new asceticism that grounds itself in an ideological subordination of women and a misogynist construction of femininity. In the early Middle Ages, women were vitally necessary for the creation of a new society. They experienced legal, social, and intellectual advancement. As female roles expanded, medieval women exercised greater power than their counterparts in classical society. As the looser structures of early medieval society became better organized, as the strength of the Church and monarchic hegemony grew, women lost their brief moment of opportunity. When the millennium arrived, women had been excluded from the mainstream of monasticism, education, and government. Death is the climactic episode in the hagiographic text of the first millennium. Before the climactic death episode, the story of the female saint may spin off onto its own narrative trajectory: Rape, prostitution, seduction, and forced marriage are the signal variations in this gendered plot. The construction of sexual assault runs through hagiography like a shining thread in a tapestry, highly valued and useful. The sexual violence in female vitae has received little critical attention. Scholars have noted that the early ideal of the virgin-martyr saint gives way to other paradigms in the high and late Middle Ages notably the queen or empress saint, and then the visionary or contemplative saint, but few have investigated the meanings of these generic paths to female sanctity. The Church fathers are well known for calling women to a virginal life. A woman could be saved from her inferior female nature only by renouncing sexuality and becoming like a man, vir, through virginity. Sexual assault is one of the preferred methods of promotion to female martyrdom in early Christian hagiography. Sexual violence takes a variety of forms and functions in the female vitae. Four types of plots are most common in the literary shaping of feminine sanctity in early hagiography. The category of vitae in which the threat of rape is made explicit demonstrates that there does exist a language for rape in the hagiographic text. The heathen loses patience with the trappings of love-talk or marriage proposals and verbalizes his intention to violate the heroine. Such direct representation of rape is less common than sex forced through marriage or ravishment by a third party in a house of prostitution. But vitae referring openly to rape exist, such as the lives of Saints Lucia, Anastasia, and Euphemia. In order to persuade the reluctant virgin to yield to his sexual demands, the heathen paints a menacing picture of life in a brothel. You are not currently authenticated.
