Next, you need to know what the data is supposed to be. Wondering how DreamHost keeps your website safe? Most data that comes in from a post is considered a string. Sometimes you might have fields like currency coming in or a page ID like in this example , which we know is only supposed to be a number. First, when we get data coming in, we want to check if the data we need is there. Then, we want to check if it actually has something there. This checks if the variable is there and also checks to verify the variable is not NULL. The trim function just strips any white space from beginning and end of the string note: If you take a look at this function on the PHP website, you can learn about other characters that you can remove with this function. First, we can actually test if the page ID is an integer by using this: So, if the value coming in is a string, instead of an integer, then it will force it to be an integer or zero 0 if not an integer. You could then test if the value equals 0, and return an error if it is. To accomplish this, we will use the htmlentities function. This function converts characters to HTML entities. So, if any tags are included, they will be converted. Checking the Length of Variables This might not seem critical, but checking the length of variables is quite important. Without checking variables, a user could cause buffer overflow issues. Not only that, but if you have a table in your database with the name as a comment, and it can only have characters. If a user types characters, then part of their post will be cut off. If you check length, you can let the user know that they need to shorten their comment. To check the length of a string, use the function strlen. This function returns the length of a string for you. If it is, then we assign it to the variable. Another option to check that the string length is enough to be a comment is something like this: Is the Format Correct From the User? Making sure the format is correct is important to verify that the information can be used correctly later, but also for error control on your site. According to the regexlib. To use it, you can do like above: Regular expressions are quite powerful and can be used to test a lot of different patterns. You can test everything from phone numbers to the character types. We validated our data by checking if it matched the data that we wanted. Here are two more tips to help protect your site from the bad guys. Wow, so how do we stop this trickery? Again, this is a first step to stopping injection and I suggest reading more about preventing this. PHP has other methods of accessing a database. Cross-Site injection is a huge security vulnerability. So, how can you help to prevent this from happening? Yoda for the Road Okay! Remember, this is only the beginning. Pass on what you have learned, Luke. There isâ€¦ anotherâ€¦ Skyâ€¦ walker.
