An interview with Roger Priddy Have you ever wondered what a publisher does? That makes it all worthwhile. What part of the book creation process do you enjoy the most? Text, illustrations, or concept development etc. We have a very seamless creative process at Priddy Books. From concept development to text to design to production to sales, they are all as important as the other and I think that is one of the reasons for our success. Talking to the sales team, booksellers and parents before we even start usually means that we are making something that we know people want. The rest is the easy bit, coming up with the ideas and concept is a bit like doing a jigsaw puzzle – you just have to fit the right pieces together. Then as we shape the project, budgets and time scales have impacts on what you produce so you have to be clever with the manufacturing process to get as much as you can into the book whilst making sure that it is still a price low enough for all to enjoy. I know my children are going to love exploring them. They are tough books with great novelties so I think that they will stand up to some wear and tear too. These are based on the type of books that I loved as a kid, simple novelties, simple story, and a bit of hide and seek thrown in. I love how each Priddy Book includes symbols to show parents what skills the books are encouraging children to develop. What gave you this idea and do you think it sets you apart from other publishers? It also makes us think harder about what a child will benefit from, owning one of our books. What made you want to establish your own publishing house and do you remember your first book? I wanted to make some money for me rather than other people! I also just wanted to do my own thing. I was very lucky that I learnt from the best. First I learnt about how important the text and explanation of something was from Peter Usborne, and then I learnt how important design was to put all that together in a visual way under Peter Kindersley at DK. We started by working on 27 books almost all at once. There were some very long days and nights back then. Did you have any idea when you founded Priddy Books in that you would one day go on to sell over million books around the world in over 35 languages?
