Chapter 1 : Africa Forums :: Africa Travel Companions Wanted

Answer 1 of 2: Hi, we are a easy going couple (54/52) and will travel to Tanzania in February We arrive at Kilimanjaro Airport on 6 February and want to do a group safari of 7 or 8 days (camping) in the northern circuit, starting 7 or 8 February.

Well, here is your chance. I have fixed dates for this tour. Starting 5th October from Chengdu and ends 14 october in Chengdu. A 10 day trip. I will arrive the day before in Chengdu for an early departure on the 5th October. I will also have two extra days afterwards for some flexibility. Then I have the freedom to stay at one place if I missed something. The total cost for the tour is approximately RMB 28, They have done this many times before and have a good feeling of the overall cost so it will be fine. We use the same guides as many others had on mammalwatching and they had a great success in finding target species. In Labahe and Tangjiahe we are restricted to use nationalpark hotel and in Ruoergai we can choose what we want on the spot. Accommodation and food is cheap in China so the biggest cost is for the guide and the fuel I guess. The areas we will visit is: Labahe for Red Panda. Daytime viewing and alot of spotlighting at night. We will spend as much time as possible out there. Both Janco and me are also keen on photographing so we will also try to make som good photos of the animals were seeing. Not only tick off on a paper. I am a guy from Sweden, 39 years old and have done alot of travelling and in recent years alot of mammalwatching trips. There is some people who have interest to join this but at the moment, Yes there is still one place open. My tour is booked and scheduled anyway. Get in touch if you are interested.

Chapter 2 : Why a safari in Tanzania is perfect for solo travellers | Travel | The Guardian

Read Online Tanzania Safari Companion Safari Companions as clear as you can Discover the key to adjoin the lifestyle by reading this Tanzania Safari Companion Safari Companions This is a nice of wedding album that you require currently.

I met Millie back in through a mutual friend. Soon Millie and I were talking on the phone for hours about the possibility of this next great adventure. Once we talked, I think she was able to make a determination whether I was someone she might be interested in traveling with. Once she signed up, her sister and brother in law, who lived on the East Coast also signed up. It was about a year in advance, typical for most of the operating safaris. It was an exciting time. The trip was to take us to Kenya, a group of nine it was. Millie is a realistic, adventurous traveler, who understands that to appreciate travel you have to appreciate the differences, in countries, in experiences and in what each offers. Two years later, I had a group going to Tanzania, and Millie, her sister and brother in law, Vicki and two other ladies who had also travelled before with Destined To Travel also joined us on that trip. You can be very disappointed when making comparisons, then everything becomes a disappointment. Simply put, what you can do in one country will differ from another! How you plan in one country will differ from another! The land, the terrain, the planning, the organization, the logistics and the safaris themselves are all quite different. Recognizing everyone has personal choices on their country of choice for safaris, we, at Destined To Travel strive for the best of the best experiences in any country, but it is Tanzania where you will have the most personal of experiences. We may not always measure up for some, but for others, they continue to return because of it. Most who have traveled to Tanzania, and to Kenya have returned over and over and over again. She and others came to another presentation in the year that my driver, Paul was visiting friends in California and she was able to meet him prior to travel in Tanzania. What a treat for Paul to meet guests in California and then be able to take them on safari in Tanzania. What a treat for Millie to be able to meet the driver in California and then go on safari with him in Tanzania. Millie will again join me on safari in Tanzania in to help celebrate my ten years in business " my anniversary trip. So looking forward to that! Her passion for travel is evident and since her first introduction to Africa, she is quick to jump at the opportunity of returning to the motherland. She has traveled on several trips with Vicki and will be again soon. What fun it is to have fun, exciting and passionate travelers along. I always look forward to those trips where Millie will be traveling. Many of you know that I do other exciting, exotic and adventurous destinations and Millie has been on many of them. Many travelers that go to Africa also go on these trips.

Neither, I say, Tarangire. Nonetheless, you feel faintly embarrassed. A German gay couple ask if I know the exchange rate between Tanzanian pounds and euros. It gets all the more perplexing when an Italian couple start cooing next to me. Am I going to feel like a freak? Messenga is my rescuer. The quality of your guide will make or break your safari. They are trained to seek what the customer wants everyone asks for lions then radio ahead and deliver. He grew up in a nearby Masai village and his knowledge of the landscape comes not from books but from a lifetime of observation and devotion to his environment. Am I being misty-eyed? But as a solo traveller, you will spend six to eight hours a day alone with your guide, and finding one who keeps you engaged and excited is extraordinary. But in the dry season, the permanent water in the Tarangire river attracts huge numbers of migratory animals including herds of elephant, wildebeest, zebra, eland and oryx. For Messenga though, Tarangire is not about the big five but the "beautiful five" and his favourites the "ugly five". They perch on high branches, ready to hunt, all over Tarangire. The yellow-and-green bee-eater, the bar-tailed trogon and two types of honeyguides make up the rest of the beautiful five. Travelling solo with a guide gives you the chance to set your own pace. Leopards, schleparads, I think, as the other camp vehicles chase a rumoured sighting. Mostly we dawdle, catching the kudus and hartebeests, spotting a tawny eagle, and having a giggle as a herd of zebras cross our path. And we talk about the Masai, still holding on to their traditions. On holiday alone, you almost automatically engage more. I learn how the country has largely avoided tribal clashes that wreck so many African nations. Evening meals are the dark night of the soul for the single traveller. Couples at every other table, when your only companion is a book. Meals are taken at a single long table, and my Come Dine With Me companions come straight from central casting. A French UN official on a break from the International Criminal Tribunal for Rwanda, a guy who was in charge of public health for San Francisco, doctors from North Carolina and four Seattle women in their 50s, resting after scaling Kilimanjaro. A security guard walks you back to your tent, assuring you a lion is unlikely to pace past in the night. But breakfast is your payoff. Silent, alone, a book lazily in hand, a fine cup of coffee, and giraffes lolloping past not more than a couple of hundred metres away. And worth it, at times like this. Only once is the serenity shattered, when the next day I share a tour. Only want lions," barks the fat rude German when Messenga pauses for a lilac-breasted roller, while his oriental partner, at least 25 years his junior, looks on impassively. When we later find a lion, I want to feed him to it. Who needs company when you have a thousand square miles of safari park to yourself and almost the greatest concentration of wildlife on earth?
